

LOVE MAKING AS A SIDE LINE FOR EGG MERCHANT

Grossfeld Says He Was Employed to Compromise Wife of Jacob Herman.

GOT SICK OF HIS JOB.

But the Dealer in Musical Instruments Flatly Denies Story of Egg-Seller.

The life of an egg merchant wouldn't seem at first thought to hold much of romance, yet the story told by Jacob Grossfeld, who deals in hen fruit at the Washington Market, to an Evening World reporter to-day shows that even a vendor of "strictly fresh" may have adventures as strange as any that ever befell the merchants of Bagdad.

Grossfeld, who makes up to weight what he lacks in height, was standing in front of his home at No. 231 Stanton street some time ago, when along came an adventure in the guise of a mysterious stranger. It was Sunday and Grossfeld was thinking whether he should go to the Park or to visit friends in the Bronx when the stranger stopped up and introduced himself as Kopel Shifter and said he worked for a firm of attorneys.

"If you want to make a man of money," said the stranger, "I can put you in the way of it."

Grossfeld fell for the cunning admixture of mystery and business and told Shifter to say on. Then Shifter told him that all he had to do to earn the money was to make love to another man's wife.

"Is the lady agreeable?" inquired Grossfeld.

Liberal With Compliments.

"She will be when she sees you," replied the Shifter ingratiatingly. "I picked you out for your handsome appearance."

The egg merchant thought of the money and Shifter's compliment, and told him he was on. He said to-day that he knows now it was just his poetic disposition that made him do it.

"How much do I get?" asked Grossfeld.

"Twenty-five dollars if you compromise the lady," said Shifter, unconsciously avoiding Joe's eyes.

"And a dollar a day so that you can take her round and show her the town," he continued enticingly.

"We can't go far on that," objected Grossfeld.

"Well, if you do the right thing, money is no object. This man is wealthy and wishes to get rid of his wife. It's up to you to furnish the excuse."

"The upshot of the matter was," said Grossfeld, "that I consented to meet Shifter that night. He took me round to No. 59 Clinton street and introduced me to Jacob Hermann, a musical instrument dealer—the man to whose wife I was to make love. She was a musician, Hermann looked me over and said he thought I'd do, but suggested I get a new hat and suit."

"You look pretty rough in that rig," he said.

"I thought everything over after that, and concluded that Mrs. Herman was getting a pretty rough deal. That night I told her how I had come to meet her husband, and agreed to meet her and her two brothers, Morris and Samuel Hanhael, the next night and let them see for themselves what Hermann's game was. In their presence for I fixed it so that they could overhear what was said—Hermann repeated his offer of $50 then I left for there was a mix-up, and Mrs. Hermann's brother's best man, her husband, he couldn't see."

The musical instrument man was married in 1886 and the couple have two children. Mr. Hermann denies absolutely the story of Grossfeld, as does Shifter. They don't know such a person, they say. Hermann declares that his wife had a boarder of whom she thought a great deal more than she did of him. He declared she chucked most of the household goods at him when on one occasion she interrupted them tea-table. They were then living at No. 111 Orchard street.

"She called me crazy and a fool," said Hermann, "and often the neighbors saw me crying at the treatment I received from her. What I suffered, no one will ever know. How can a man make deals with a soul in them when his wife won't cook for him and disturbs the artistic atmosphere necessary to the best results in his art?"

He had told me to get busy quick, and when I saw Mrs. Hermann outside I walked up to her and told her I was a friend of her husband who sympathized with her troubles. I understand he treats you very badly," I said.

"What she told me then first awakened my sympathy. She said Hermann gave her no money and threw dishes at her and struck her frequently. I told her how sorry I was and suggested we should marry after she had got a divorce. She told me she didn't want a divorce, so as I thought I had earned my dollar, I quit for the day. Daniel Tinsman Comes Back From Prison to Face Charges of Bigamy.

As if he did not have trouble enough in pursuing a busy career as a burglar, Daniel Tinsman had to go and account for four wives, one of Tinsman's helpmates, Mary, who lives at No. 23 East One Hundred and Fourth street, became aware of the existence of the others a few weeks ago and reported Daniel's Mormon tactics to the police.

She said she had not seen him for more than a year. A search of the records revealed good reason. He was on Blackwell's Island serving a year for robbery and assault.

Tinsman was released from the island today. As he stepped upon the shore of Manhattan Island he was met by three detectives with a warrant. They took him to Centre Street Court and had him committed on a charge of bigamy.

Three of Tinsman's wives were married to him within three years. When it is considered that he spent more than one year of that time in the Tombs and on Blackwell's Island his work as a burglar appears to have been reasonably rapid.

His police record as a robber goes back to 1890, when he blackjacked a druggist in his store in lower Second avenue. He is not quite forty years old.
